Investing on Lifelong Education For The Future of Southeast Asians

CONCEPT NOTE

1. Background

Since the outbreak of COVID-19, governments from various countries have had to impose a complete closure of all educational institutions and turn to home-based learning. The transformation from traditional classrooms to digital education has become an inevitable part of the comprehensive precautionary measures all around the world. Southeast Asia, which is so far home to over a million COVID-19 cases, was no exception. Students of Southeast Asian countries found themselves, overnight, with no option but remote education through the available digital tools.

The unforeseen move to virtual learning due to COVID-19 touched upon real problems in the Southeast Asian states' communication systems. Now that students are no longer offered physical communication with their teachers, the governmental educational authorities are obligated to provide accessible alternatives to contain the crisis and avoid further implications. During this journey, governments should get over the following hurdling road bumps.

Initiating more substantial efforts for lifelong learning helps to withstand the concept of never stopping learning throughout the lifetime. It's about being curious, eager to understand the world around us and reinventing our set of skills based on where we want to get next. Since education is a critical component of a country's human capital which helps economies to move up the value chain beyond manual tasks processes, investing in lifelong education could certainly promote longer-term investment in education.
